

HASTINGS LEGACY REVIEW COMMITTEE
REPORT TO CHANCELLOR & DEAN DAVID FAIGMAN

Submitted July 29, 2020

1. REPORT BY: Hastings Legacy Review Committee (“HLRC”)
- Chair Thomas Gede
- Vice Chair Robert Sall
2. SUBJECT: Recommendations of the Hastings Legacy Review Committee
3. BACKGROUND:

In 1878, California’s first Chief Justice, Serranus C. Hastings donated $100,000 to the State of California to establish a law school in his name as part of the University of California. Hastings College of the Law was formed on the basis of this gift, and the institution’s name was codified as such in the Education Code.

In recent years, there has been heightened scrutiny concerning the role of the College’s founder, Chief Justice Hastings, in the mass killing of California Indians in the 1850’s and 1860’s, most notably in the Round Valley and Eden Valley areas in Mendocino County. In particular, the Yuki tribal people of that area were decimated in targeted violence in which Serranus Hastings was likely complicit. There has been some public response and call to address the past and remove the association of the Hastings name from Hastings College of the Law.

The Hastings Legacy Review Committee (the “Committee” or “HLRC”) was formed by Chancellor & Dean David Faigman in August 2017 to research and evaluate the appropriate public response to the participation, if any, in these genocidal acts by the College’s founder. HLRC consists of 13 volunteer members, including alumni, faculty, staff, educators and practitioners in the areas of tribal law including, water rights, land conservation transactions, cultural resource protection, land claims and environmental protection.

Dean Faigman charged the Committee with examining the extent to which Justice Hastings was involved in these murders and other acts of violence perpetrated against the native peoples in those regions and throughout the state, and if the Committee determined that Justice Hastings had some culpability, to make recommendations to the Dean as to what the appropriate institutional response should be. This report should be understood to be solely for the consideration of, and further action by, the Chancellor & Dean, as he formulates his own plans and recommendations for the College.

Professor Brendan Lindsay of Sacramento State University is the author of Murder State: California's Native American Genocide, 1846-1873. Professor Lindsay was commissioned in 2017 to research and write a historical paper describing Hastings’ actions in the Round and Eden Valleys, and to place those actions in the context of the history of California’s Native population. Dean Faigman also invited Professor Lindsay to serve on the Committee, a position that he graciously accepted.

Professor Lindsay's white paper further corroborated the historical narrative that Serranus Hastings bears significant responsibility for violence in eastern Mendocino County in 1859. For a summary of those findings, see Exhibit A. Accordingly, the Committee believes that the College must make a public response, acknowledge these atrocities, and establish programs to benefit and improve conditions in the affected tribal communities. This report provides several discrete recommendations to achieve those ends, outlined below. Additionally, this report sets forth reasons why the Committee believes that merely changing the name of the College would not be a meaningful or significant public response.

In seeking to study what would be a meaningful public response, the Committee sought input from the Native American community. With the assistance of Intertribal Sinkyone Wilderness Council, and following meetings and dialogue with the Council, we established relationships with the descendants of the affected Native peoples, including the members of the Tribal Council of the Round Valley Indian Tribes (RVIT). As part of this process, HLRC has focused its efforts on those most impacted by the Hastings legacy, the Yuki descendants living in the Round Valley. HLRC has addressed means by which the College can help the Yuki descendants and related tribes to tell their stories, keep the memory of these crimes in focus, and appropriately frame Serranus Hastings' role in the history not only of this institution, but also of the region and its people. The Committee has undertaken to collaborate on academic and public service endeavors as our institution comes to terms with responding to the darker side of our founder's legacy.

HLRC has concluded that, as an institution, we could make a significant positive impact for the benefit of the local tribal communities still most affected by the killings and theft of property that took place more than 160 years in the past. Recognizing that Serranus Hastings' murderous actions are a stain upon the noble institution that he founded, the Committee supports the institution taking affirmative steps to engage in restorative justice. The Round Valley region of Mendocino County suffers from many social ills, including poverty, addiction, unemployment and lack of public resources. HLRC has concluded that the best approach for the College was not to whitewash or to promote the erasure of the killings, enslavement and displacement in which Serranus Hastings was a willing participant. Rather, it is to highlight it, and to respond by showing another side – by establishing an institutional partnership with the affected tribal community, addressing the existing social needs and providing a significant contribution to its growth and well-being.

HLRC reached consensus on the recommendations below to develop collaborative and supportive programs to benefit the affected tribal communities and to develop a restorative justice agenda, academic engagement and public awareness. HLRC did not reach consensus on the question of whether to re-name the College; as explained below, while a majority of members were of the view the name should not be changed, there were dissenting views, one of which is attached. HLRC submits its report and recommendation with the recognition that you, as Chancellor & Dean, may wish to further examine, survey or develop the issues related to a name change by whatever means you wish. However, this Committee has discharged its duty to report and make recommendations per the original charge.

4. REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE HASTINGS LEGACY REVIEW COMMITTEE

HLRC submits this report to the Chancellor & Dean as contemplated in its formation and charge to examine the legacy and role of Serranus Hastings relating to multiple genocidal acts and theft of property of Native American people in Northern California. While there are dissenting views expressed on some of the issues addressed herein, this report was unanimously approved by the Committee on July 28, 2020. The report incorporates the Background set forth above and includes various recommendations for consideration of the Chancellor & Dean for implementation at the College.

To develop recommendations for positive action by the College, HLRC appointed a subcommittee to consider programs in law that might be of benefit for Native American students, including available resources for establishing law related programs, promoting legal and political externships, scholarship, and recruiting students interested in the study of Indian Law. Among other things, HLRC strongly supports an effort to establish an Indian Law Center at Hastings that would become the preeminent Northern California resource for legal education in this field and would allow the recruitment of students whose practices will focus on Native American legal issues and meeting the legal needs of that community.

As part of the Committee's outreach in Round Valley, our delegation discussed with community leaders the needs of tribal members and potential means for Hastings to engage with the community to achieve their goals. We have discussed the potential formation of a jointly-administered IRC § 501(c)(3) charitable entity which could raise funds through philanthropy and other public or private resources for funding, and to implement programs with the assistance of our institution's resources in legal practice, education, clinical work, access to alumni and others willing to contribute through pro bono services.

The Committee envisions that Hastings should provide not only the types of programs recommended herein, but also, advance the means to speak to a broader audience by actively communicating Hastings' efforts at reconciliation and partnership with the Round Valley tribal community, encouraging and supporting their educational goals and establishing a longstanding institutional process and commitment toward restoration, reparation and involvement.

Recently, we have been informed that a core group of Yuki descendants has been organized at the Round Valley Tribal level, to have primary involvement in the interaction with Hastings. This group presently consists of Reuben Becerra (Chair), Marlene Fulwider (Secretary), Julian Medel (member), Deb Hutt (Sergeant at Arms), Doug Hutt, William Hutt (youth seat), Maria Medel, Ozua Medel and Mona Oandasas (Vice Chair). The Committee anticipates that this core group will be the persons with whom Hastings will primarily communicate going forward, if these recommendations proceed to action.

The following goals were identified as potential projects supported by tribal leadership, and through which both an institutional and pro bono effort of alumni and students could have positive impacts in a community very much in need:

- Formation of a 501(c)(3) entity in association with, and jointly governed by, the Round Valley Indian Tribes to provide an organizational structure to raise capital, organize pro bono volunteers, assist tribal leadership with state and county issues, property issues, economic development and efforts to meet the social needs of the community;
- Structure clinical or experiential education programs bearing in mind the specific needs of residents of Round Valley, with the potential support for a center for pro bono legal assistance in tribal legal matters and public law assistance, potentially staffed with student interns, faculty leadership and pro bono contributors;
- Reach out to Governor Newsom’s Tribal Advisor to engage with, and contribute to, that office and the newly-formed Truth and Healing Council, which is working to clarify the historical record of mistreatment, violence and neglect of Native Americans in California;
- Organize pro bono attorneys with a connection to Hastings to assist in defined goals;
- Assist tribal leaders with other community legal needs such as contributing resources to local education and curriculum, preserving the Yuki story, preservation of tribal oral traditions and stories, and advancement in teaching and preserving native languages;
- Assist with the legal aspects of establishing a museum or cultural center in Round Valley, along with a project for protection of sacred sites and repatriation of artifacts and human remains;
- Bring attention to the public at large and the Hastings community with a lecture series, guest speakers, tribal elders, dealing with “Righting the Wrongs”;
- Support the collaboration through the use of Hastings staff to seek grant opportunities from public and private sources issues and concerns of tribal leadership;
- Dedicate a memorial to the Yuki people at an appropriate location within the Hastings campus, with display panels, historical explanations and cultural presentations;
- Provide a fully-functional, interactive public website to allow dissemination of the College’s approach, to seek public input and to keep the public advised of historical, academic, and programmatic work to address the broader issues and the restorative justice agenda;
- HLRC further recommends the establishment of an Indian Law Program and related academic and educational programs at Hastings, available to all students interested in studying Indian Law. The goal of these programs is the encouragement of scholarship, educational growth, opportunity and support for students, and recruitment of qualified individuals from on the Round Valley Tribes and /or Yuki descendants for legal education and career opportunities in law;

- Finally, HLRC encourages the Dean to engage to publicize these efforts and disseminate an opinion and editorial, perhaps individually or jointly written with a representative of the Yuki descendants, to acknowledge the tragic history of the Round Valley community and to encourage and publicize these efforts at reconciliation.

5. CONSIDERATIONS RELATING TO THE NAME OF THE COLLEGE

In recent years, many institutions of higher education have considered renaming structures on their campuses in light of evidence that donors or other people associated with the institution have connections to some of the worst episodes of American history. In each instance, these institutions have balanced the harms caused by retaining the problematic name with the harms caused by changing it. This Committee engaged in a similar balance. In our discussions, the Committee also recognized the current wave of sensitivity toward monuments and institutional names with a racist legacy, and the public outcry for an end to racism and the removal of such symbols.

Calculating the harms caused by retaining the name is necessarily speculative, but the calculation is nonetheless a searching one. A decision to retain the name risks adverse publicity and members of the public may react negatively to the College's decision. Such a reaction could have a negative impact on the College if there were political repercussions that affected our relationships in Sacramento. Additionally, retaining the name may send a message to prospective students, current students, alumni, faculty, staff, and the public that the College is insensitive to the profoundly negative impact that Serranus Hastings' legacy has had on California society in general, and on the lives of contemporary Native Peoples in particular. This impression of insensitivity could have a number of negative impacts. Most significant would be if retaining the name interfered with the College's ability to educate students by contributing to a campus environment in which Native American students or other students of color felt marginalized. Retaining the name might also make it more difficult for the College to recruit such students. Similar difficulties might arise with respect to faculty and staff. Finally, there may be a segment of alumni less inclined to donate if the College retains the name.

The Committee also considered the harms that would result from a decision to change the name. Some of these harms are speculative, but also potentially serious. For better or worse, the College's identity is intimately connected with the name Hastings. Indeed, the Committee discussed the ways in which the word "Hastings" has acquired secondary meaning that is independent of the name associated with the school's original donor. We are a standalone law school, not associated with a specific university or campus. When people think of Hastings, they generally think of the college, not the man. Accordingly, our identity as an institution, including our national reputation and our alumni's reputations, is particularly associated with the secondary meaning of the name of the College. Changing the name, given the secondary meaning that it has acquired after 142 years, could lead to public confusion about our identity. This, in turn, could result in a decline in applications and perhaps a loss of philanthropic and alumni support.

There are also more concrete harms associated with changing the College's name. These relate to the College's peculiar constitutional status and the nature of Serranus Hastings' bequest to the school. Because the name of the institution is codified in the California Education Code, a legislative act would be required to change its name. See Exhibits B and C. Additionally, based upon the language of the original gift and the legislation approving it, should the College cease to use the name Hastings, it appears that the statute would require the State to restore to Serranus Hastings' family the sum of $100,000 plus "all unexpended accumulated interest" that has accrued in the last 142 years. The potential financial consequences in terms of both the status of the bequest and the legal costs of resolving the issue are substantial and cannot be fully known, even if the Legislature were to consider a name change. Potential financial risk is especially problematic at this time, given the significant financial stress and uncertainty the College is experiencing as a consequence of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Finally, the Committee considered the question of "erasure." As former Harvard University President Drew Gilpin Faust has noted, changing names may amount to falsely negating historical truths and legacies. The people and culture behind these names, she has maintained, should be historically understood and contextualized. Erasing a name takes away that important opportunity. When the question of a name change was posed to leaders of the Round Valley Indian Tribes, one response was to the effect: "If you change the name, we'll never hear from you again."

The Committee balanced these harms and benefits of a name change and a majority of the Committee concluded that the College should not change its name. This conclusion is based on three considerations. First, we must recognize that the College's situation is sui generis. The Committee has not been able to identify any other American institution of higher education that has changed its name in response to revelations about its namesake. Changing the name of a building, a quad, or a road on campus is substantially different from changing the name of the institution as a whole, especially if the name in question has acquired an secondary meaning. The former has only a minimal impact on the public identity of the institution, while the latter would have substantial past, present and future impacts, particularly on a small, free-standing institution like Hastings.

Second, the Committee noted that there are considerable financial risks associated with a name change. Most concerning to the Committee was the fact that the extent of these risks is both unknown and potentially enormous. The Committee notes that this Committee did not conduct an in-depth analysis of the financial costs of changing the name of the College and leaves that question to further consideration by the Chancellor & Dean. Even if the legal issues related to a name change could be resolved in a manner that minimized the cost to the College, the legal expenses would be considerable and the financial instability that could arise prior to the resolution of the issue might be substantial. Considering the College's resources and the perilous economic times we are entering, the Committee believes that avoiding these risks is important to the institution.

Finally, in making its recommendation on this issue, the Committee did not discount the risk that a decision not to change the College's name could have a negative impact on its relationship with some of its stakeholders. However, fundamental to the Committee's consideration of how the College should deal with Serranus Hastings' legacy was the principle of restorative justice. As such, several Committee members articulated that central to our considerations here are the affected tribal communities (the most important stakeholders in this matter) and their concerns about erasure and role we can play in reaching truth and healing.

Nonetheless, there were dissenting views on the name change issue, acknowledging the issue is very challenging and may need more development. While none of the Committee members supported a name change at this time, four of the Committee members, including members of the faculty, expressed views that a decision regarding name change should not be final, that further study is warranted, and that input on the subject from students, alumni and the greater community needs to be obtained before a permanent decision is made. Suggestions were made for a further study group or committee to be formed to continue with solicitation of public input. HLRC submits that the Chancellor & Dean may wish to further study the broader historical context or call for additional research and analysis relating to the question.

The Committee is confident that the implementation of its many substantive recommendations, outlined above, will put the College at the forefront of the state's efforts to come to terms with the devastating effects of settler colonialism on California's Native Peoples. Accordingly, the Committee believes that whatever the impact of a final decision to change or not to change the College's name turns out to be, it will be substantially mitigated by the College's actions – actions that aim to be concrete, rather than symbolic, steps towards restorative justice.

6. CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the Committee recommends that the Chancellor & Dean consider the following special actions:

- That the Chancellor & Dean give due consideration to recommendations for engaging a faculty chair for the establishment of an Indian Law Center at Hastings, and the implementation of same. Such a program, if pursued, should encourage scholarship, invite academic study and debate, support community educational needs to aid in efforts to develop the growth and encourage individuals of Native American descent to study the law, and provide the continued and sophisticated study of contemporary and historical aspects of the tribes;
- That the Chancellor & Dean seek approval for Hastings to develop and implement programs for the reconciliation and partnership with the Round Valley Tribal Community, encourage and support community academic and educational goals and establish an ongoing institutional commitment and process toward restoration, reparation and involvement.
- That the Chancellor & Dean seek approval for authorization to work with assigned faculty and pro bono volunteers to establish clinical programs for public service and education consistent with the shared goals of Hastings College of the Law and Round

Valley Tribal Community representatives with particular emphasis on working with and defining the goals of the core group of Yuki descendants;

- That Hastings provide its organizational support and legal resources for the formation of a 501(c)(3) entity, with shared management in association with designated representatives of the Round Valley Indian Tribes, to pursue funding and establishment of programs designed to meet the shared goals of Hastings and the Round Valley Tribal Community.
- That the Chancellor & Dean give appropriate consideration to an interactive public website as outlined above, and for a means of deriving further input from alumni, students and the community at large as to the question of a permanent name change for the College.

Serranus Clinton Hastings in Eden and Round Valleys

Historical Paper

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

This white paper explores the actions of Serranus Clinton Hastings in the historical context of the California Gold Rush, and what role, if any, he played in atrocities committed against California Indian peoples living in and around Eden and Round valleys near the present-day town of Covelo in Mendocino County during the 1850s and 1860s. As founder, endower, and namesake of the University of California's Hastings College of the Law, this is vital to our understanding of the history leading up to the establishment of the college in 1878.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The story of Serranus Clinton Hastings is both unique and commonplace. Commonplace in that he is emblematic of many Americans arriving in California following the discovery of gold in 1848: Hastings came seeking greater fortune, acquired public land, and to build a new life for himself and his family. Much like his countrymen, he had little concern for Indian peoples, beyond the threat they posed to his property. He is unique in the scale of his landholdings, his lasting wealth, his public notoriety, and, especially, his political power and influence. Unlike most others who came for the Gold Rush, Hastings became lastingly wealthy owing to his entrepreneurial activities and investments, a portion of which was founded on his landholdings.

After a successful political career in territorial and state politics in Iowa, Hastings came to California as part of the Gold Rush. Unlike most of the so-called Argonauts, he determined to make his fortune outside the Mother Lode, through a combination of public service, legal practice, and entrepreneurship. In all of these pursuits he achieved success, particularly in his entrepreneurial pursuits.

Hastings arrived with a prominent reputation owing to time in the territorial and state legislatures and as a one-term member of the U.S. House of Representatives for Iowa, where he was also chief justice of the state's highest court. Arriving in California, being a well-known and prominent Democrat, Hastings was appointed as the first Chief Justice of the California Supreme Court. Following his time on the bench, he was elected as the state's third attorney general. While there is significant evidence that Hastings was heavily involved in banking and real estate ventures while in these offices, there is no evidence that he used these positions in any official capacity to further his interests. Having cemented strong political connections in the state, Hastings left public service and turned his eye to pecuniary pursuits.

Focusing on real estate speculation and acquisition, Hastings became one of the largest landowners in California, owning many tens of thousands of acres throughout the northern half of the state. The money to acquire these lands came from a modest nest egg brought with him from Iowa, his salaries as chief justice and attorney general, legal fees received as a practicing attorney, the proceeds of individual and corporate banking and finance activities, logging, and the profits generated by agriculturally driven businesses (including farming, stock raising, and viticulture). Most of all, cycles of land purchase, sale for profit, and acquisition of new properties, combined with the revenues generated by leases of his properties, account for his notable wealth. It is because of the centrality of land to his fortune that questions arise about his role in negatively influencing Indian-white relations in Northern California. Indeed, some have charged that he is responsible in part for fomenting violence and atrocity against California Indians, particularly in and around his holdings in Eden Valley.

According to the historical record—including depositions, letters, and statements by Hastings' contemporaries—significant proof exists that this was the case. Serranus Hastings purchased all of Eden Valley, drove hundreds of head of livestock there, and had a series of stockmen manage his herds. As Eden Valley was home to approximately six hundred Yuki people at the time, the combination of violent stock managers mistreating Indian people and competition for resources created a strained relationship that led to cycles of violence in the valley, as well as in nearby Long and Round valleys. Particularly in colder months, the Yuki came onto the valley floor to forage for grass seeds, acorns, game, and fish, only to find the grass eaten and the game driven off by large herds of cattle and horses, the acorns eaten by hogs, and the path to rivers and streams blocked by white settlement. As a result, the Yuki raided stock to subsist. In retaliation, white ranchers and settlers killed the Yuki. In response, the Yuki killed more stock—now in retaliation, not just to eat—and, rarely, also killed white men. This cycle repeated, over and over. It is important to note, this state of affairs was not unique to the region or for men like Hastings: these cycles of violence existed throughout the state of California in the 1850s and 1860s. While not unique, it is important to note that there were some contributing factors to this often-seen cycle that were indeed exceptional in the case of Eden and Round valleys.

Hastings' first stock manager, H. L. Hall, who both watched the cattle and horses and operated a farm with over fifty Indian workers, mistreated the local Indigenous population. Hall, known for his violence against Indians, abused and cheated Indian workers, and whipped them if they complained. This led to Yuki retaliation against the stock housed in the valley. Hall not only went out on brutal retaliatory raids against the Yuki, he also notified Hastings of the threat to his investments—without telling Hastings of his role in starting the trouble. Hastings responded by bringing his considerable political and financial influence into play—something not to be found elsewhere in terms of his prominence.

Hastings visited Eden Valley, had personal and community meetings with settlers in the region (the settlers primarily lived to the north, in adjacent Round Valley, not in Eden Valley itself), and suggested forming a volunteer company to suppress local Indian populations. He dictated the petitions to the governor, a personal friend of his, and also offered to finance the operations of the company until state or federal funds could reimburse these efforts. For those hesitant to support such actions, Hastings personally implored individuals to reconsider. He also wrote military commanders and the governor personal letters urging action. In his letters to the governor, he offered to provide salaries and supplies, as well as facilitate the formation and operation of the volunteer companies. Assisting him in this was his business partner, Thomas J. Henley, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for California. Henley made his home in Round Valley, which also contained a reservation—the Nome Cult Indian Farm. Henley's interests were well-served by formation of a volunteer company: The company would suppress local Indian resistance and bring prisoners there, which would augment the reservation workforce—a workforce Henley and his cronies were using to work their farms, sawmill, and ranching operations, free of charge and at the expense of the federal government. In advance of the governor's approval, Hastings selected a captain for the company and encouraged its formation. Indeed, the Eel River Rangers, as they called themselves, took the field without authorization.

The operations of the company seem to have been well known to Hastings. The captain of the Eel River Rangers, Walter S. Jarboe, a notoriously violent “Indian fighter,” kept Hastings apprised of the Rangers' activities in back-channel reports. During these operations, Hastings continued to write the governor and monitor developments in the field. In particular, he scorned U.S. Army officers in the region, who protected Indian interests rather than advanced white interests. Hastings also gave intelligence to the local press, encouraging them to support the efforts of the Eel River Rangers. For Hastings, Henley, and the local white population, the operations of the Rangers were a huge success.

By the time the Eel River Rangers disbanded in 1860, evidence suggests that Eden Valley had been totally depopulated of Yuki people. This conflict—the Rangers and other white settlers fighting with Yuki over land and resources, July 1859 to January 1860—became known as the Mendocino War. Eventually, it spread into the adjacent valleys and produced disastrous consequences for not only Yuki living there, but other Native American groups as well. Conservatively, approximately six hundred Native Americans were directly killed in Long, Round, and Eden valleys, and many hundreds more taken prisoner and forced into slavery on Henley's Nome Cult Indian Farm or the Mendocino Reservation, or on private ranches and farms as domestic and agricultural slaves (euphemistically called apprentices or servants by whites). This included women and children, some of whom were clearly also being sexually abused by the almost all-male population of Round Valley. Evidence also suggests that hundreds more Native Americans were killed or captured by unauthorized vigilante companies.

By the conclusion of the Mendocino War in January 1860, word of atrocities had spread to the point that the state sent a five-man investigative committee to the region to take depositions and formulate a report on the conflict. Made up of members of the California State Senate and Assembly, the investigation produced two reports: a majority report supported by four members, and a minority report authored and supported by one member. The latter report, authored by an assemblyman from Mendocino County, supported the efforts of the local settlers. The majority report condemned what had happened as despicable. Neither report, however, produced any substantive outcomes. Despite the fact that many of the depositions taken included clear evidence of criminal behavior—including rape, murder, and fraud—no charges were ever brought against the members of the Eel River Rangers or the settlers involved in ad hoc, unauthorized companies operating against the Native population of Round, Long, and Eden valleys. As to Serranus Hastings, he was not called out or singled out for the role he played.

Hastings' holdings were secure, and his direct involvement in the affairs of Eden and Round valleys ends in the historical record after 1861. But the consequences of his actions and those of his fellow Americans have been lasting and devastating, particularly for the Native Americans driven onto reservations as part of the campaigns Hastings orchestrated. While Hastings did not come under direct scrutiny at the time, the federal government undertook investigations into the activities of Hastings' business partner, Thomas J. Henley, and his agents and employees working at the reservation in Round Valley, uncovering wide-ranging fraud and malfeasance. Despite Henley and his subagent's firings, corruption persisted for decades to come, with a revolving-door of agents and superintendents holding these patronage posts engaging in similar nefarious practices, to the detriment of the Native Americans of Round Valley and California. Violence against the much-depleted California Indian population of the region continued into the 1870s, although on a much reduced scale. The Round Valley Indian Reservation continued to operate, but with the Yuki no longer forming its core population—the war had so devastated their numbers, they were soon outnumbered by other California Indian groups being removed to the reservation, sometimes from many miles away. Yuki or not, the reservation remained a horrific place for internees. Corruption by Indian agents was the rule rather than the exception. Native Americans, in addition to the continued specter of violence, rape, and kidnap, suffered from malnutrition, disease, and exposure. Reservation life was further complicated by white squatter's attempts to claim portions of the Round Valley, despite its designation as a federal Indian reservation. Ultimately, the settlers won out, and the size of the reservation reduced to make way for settlement.

By the 1880s, national events began to overtake the surviving Native Americans in and around Round Valley. The Dawes Act, a federal law designed to force Indian assimilation by allotting lands to individuals rather than maintaining tribal holdings in trust passed in 1887. Allotment granted title to individual Indians, then offered the remainder of lands for sale to non-Indians. This resulted in further losses for Native groups unable to resist allotment, including Native Americans in Round Valley. Meanwhile, the Native Americans of Round Valley were overlooked or ignored by developments that might have helped them. For instance, efforts at reform in some parts of the state—especially southern California—concentrated on former Mission Indian populations, and mostly disregarded the rural Native populations in the rest of the state.

American citizenship for Native Americans in the 1920s, Depression-era federal programs, and the rise of employment during World War I and World War II provided some small benefits, but nothing close to ameliorating the extreme poverty found in the Round Valley region. Without the protection of federal Indian treaties, the Yuki and other Indian residents of the valley had few protections and almost no legal recourse. In 1936 the Round Valley Indian Tribe, a conglomeration of the descendants of several Native groups, including the Yuki, was recognized by the federal government, following the creation of a tribal constitution and government under the New Deal's Indian Reorganization Act of 1934. Despite federal recognition—something many California Indian groups are still battling for today—life remains difficult for the Native Americans of Round Valley. In the years following World War II, the reservation and its surrounding area have witnessed a steady economic decline. The most recent employment figures for the reservation suggest an unemployment rate of nearly ninety percent. Meanwhile, to the south, Eden Valley remains non-Native land.

Serranus Hastings, well known as a philanthropist, legal scholar, and California founding father, has a complicated legacy, one containing connections to the darkest chapter in the history of California. While one cannot say the $100,000 endowment made by Hastings in 1878 was drawn entirely from monies generated by his real estate investments in Eden Valley, or the stock he raised and sold that had lived and grazed there, one can argue that some fractional portion of his total fortune certainly did emanate from there—and thus from his actions supporting atrocities against Native Americans, especially the Yuki of Eden and Round valleys. While many white Californians in the nineteenth-century California had blood on their hands, either by participation, complicity, or silent acceptance of atrocity, Hastings' involvement in this episode was nonetheless significant.

Copy of the March 26, 1878 Act to Create Hastings College of the Law, in the University of the State of California

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
HASTINGS COLLEGE OF THE LAW

200 McALLISTER STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CA 94102-4978

LEGAL STATUS OF HASTINGS COLLEGE OF THE LAW

- The Act creating Hastings College of the Law, March 26, 1878 (copy attached), was enacted prior to the time the University of California was elevated to constitutional status.
- It states that:
 - (1) S. C. Hastings be authorized to found and establish a law college whose officers shall be a Dean, Registrar, and eight directors who shall, when vacancies occur, fill the same from members of the Bar Association of the City of San Francisco with always one director being some heir or representative of S. C. Hastings;
 - (2) that the Law College shall affiliate with the University of the State upon such terms as shall be for the welfare of the College and the University; and
 - (3) that the College shall be the Law Department of the University.
- The University was elevated to constitutional status in 1879. The Constitution provided that there was to be no change in the substantive law relating to the University and the institutions that had been previously affiliated. The new constitutional provision specifically provided that "The University..., and its organization and government shall be perpetually continued in the same form and character prescribed by the Organic Act creating the same..."
- As early as 1879, the Supreme Court ruled that the College should affiliate with the University and be governed by the laws applicable to the University "...except as otherwise provided, either in the act of 1868 or in the act of 1878..." (Foltz vs. Hoge, 54 Cal. 28)
- More recently, in 1987, the Court of Appeals, in Tofoya vs. Hastings College of the Law, had this to say: "Thus, in the only two cases concerning the status of Hastings to reach our highest court, it has been affirmed that Hastings is an affiliate of and governed by the same laws as the University."
- The California Education Code provisions governing the University of California apply to Hastings. Section 92201 provides that Hastings is affiliated with the University and is the Law Department of the University.
- While there is no formal written agreement between the University and Hastings, there is ample evidence of a cooperative, friendly relationship which has lasted 112 years.

Paul Laurin's Dissenting Views on Re-naming

Response Comments Regarding Proposed Recommendations of HLRC: Statement of Paul J, Laurin of May 19, 2020

A moment on process: Recently the tempo of decision-making for the HLRC has loped ahead, in part on non-controversial matters but also as to controversial ones. Late last year after Anne Marie Helm departed essential aspects of what we intended to do were abandoned, as far as I can tell without much discussion. I have felt since last month, in the midst of a global pandemic, that a “cram-down” of a minority view is underway on the critical issue of naming of the College. Given the process, written plan and substantial efforts undertaken since 2017 I believe fundamental fairness mandates that the vital process of discussion and debate over name change occur over an appropriate schedule and slow down. We have not completed that process. In fact, we have just begun it. If there are gripping concerns about the existential threat such action poses to the College, this is a place to air that. Cramming a recommendation through is not going to provide the closure and healing we should be encouraging by our process.

Now more substantive comments which I will asked to appended to any report submitted as presently formulated:

The HLRC is poised to make a historic and disturbing finding on the conduct of its founder. Serranus Hastings did not use his position of power and prestige as he should have, on that we all seem to agree. However, the full measure of the public morality of the man remains somewhat obscured behind some of his outsized accomplishments. But that he was significantly responsible for genocidal atrocities against the native peoples of Round Valley is not in dispute.

Going back years, what initiated our endeavor was the public condemnation of SH and call for a reexamination of the naming of the college for a historical figure possessed of such dubious appetite and ambition to accumulate wealth at the expense of others.

What we have learned in viewing the specific acts of Hastings and his cohorts in the Round Valley has only served to solidify the view that Hastings was capable of, and likely engaged, in reprehensible brutality directed against native peoples. One can be confident it likely did not end there. But the analysis remains unclear in putting the man into broader context of the other events of the day such as the Civil War, slavery and immigrant exploitation.

It is disturbing to confront such a character as the progenitor of the school and realize he reflects the dark professional ethos of a preeminent lawyer and jurist of the time in California.

This is a hard and unpleasant task. But it is vital that it be done because treatment of native peoples and race stand so central to the North American experience.

I submit that the report as drafted with its recommendation on name changing fundamentally has failed to do what the committee set out to do: That is, to robustly grapple with and deliberate the public policy implications of name change, fully informed by pertinent historical context, legal analysis and critical community input from the alumni and broader community.

Now we must acknowledge his name will be inescapably associated with the most inconceivable of crimes, made more inconceivable because of the stature he enjoyed. And his name is the name many of us carry on our diplomas.

I know this fundamental failure of the committee has occurred because I spent hours reconstructing the committee's timeline. In doing so I was disappointed, because I felt much time, effort and good will had been dismissed.

I am also dismayed because I feel a critical opportunity to do right by an open and fairly informed process is being rejected on an accelerated timeline amidst a great global crisis.

I also believe the short shrift given to name change in the report and the Committee perhaps misses a broader and critical opportunity for the law school, within the broader context of the University of California.

I view my role in serving as not only a single alumnus and life-long Californian educated entirely in its public education system, but also as the former president of the BOG, the volunteer board of the 20,000 plus member alumni association—for 4 years I served on the BOG. It is the group dedicated to and predicated upon promoting alumni engagement and inclusion in the ongoing life of the college.

Sadly, those alumni are being excluded and rebuffed in a fundamental way by this process.

In June 2018, Professor Schiller wrote a carefully considered and reasoned memo for the Subcommittee on Renaming entitled Proposal Regarding Renaming. [I will submit it with this statement.]

I literally was the sole dissenter from its reasoned view that the committee could not as a fundamental organic matter credibly make a name change recommendation. The memo submitted (while I was in Europe) literally says:

- [i]t is imperative that the decision [on name change] be made only after a robust, transparent process that includes input from all stakeholders.
- [It further states] Notwithstanding Professor's Lindsey's report, "the Committee believes that there is some historical information with respect to other aspects of Hastings' life , as well as substantial non-historical information with respect to the consequences of renaming that have not been generated."
- Finally, in crafting the guidance on naming considerations, Professor Schiller for the subcommittee expressed discomfort at applying the principles to a specific instance, stating "One of the basic assumptions of the rule of law is that there be a substantial separation between the institutions that craft the rules of general applicability and those that apply those rules to specific cases."
- [That is to say, the Committee in identify appropriate considerations should not also engage applying them.]

I do not believe these recommendations were rejected but instead the Committee (in part at my recommendation stated as a “disagreement”) chose to leave the record open and develop it to see where it would lead. Principal in doing so was the expectation, stated by Professor Schiller, that the Committee would retain outside counsel to advise on bequests and donative issues as well generate information on Constitutional and Legislative issues.

Professor Schiller’s reluctance to recommend name change was not embraced in June 2018. Instead the Committee undertook to fully develop the record, get advice on pertinent legal and legislative issues, seek community input and then revisit the issue.

Since we clearly have not done that, this raises the question what has changed since then regarding the issues informing name change (as contrasted with the very significant work done on restorative programs at the college) then: As far as I can tell, Nothing. Nothing but the conclusion that the difficulties and impediments of an easy and conservative approach are worth abandoning these vital inputs.

When I reviewed my archives, I realized Anne Marie Helm lead the subcommittee on a community survey. Multiple drafts were exchanged. I found extensive discussion all the way through July 2019. Chief Marketing Officer, Alex Shapiro, was brought in expressly to support the technological roll out of an online survey to alumni and the community.

I was not notified and found no reference in the meeting reports of any determination to abandoned that important process. But Ms. Helm, Mr. Shapiro, John McCoy and Elise Traynum have all departed the college, and with them apparently the impetus to organize the effort at soliciting community opinion and further input and analysis.

In late 2019 after Anne Marie’s departure and until February, 2020, I located no HLRC communications regarding the survey or name change issues.

Then, in notes of the February 27, 2020 meeting I see a refence to the report being presented in person—it was not circulated to me by email. (I was absent due a death in the family and notified the Chairman of that circumstance..)

Then on April 2, 2020, well after the emergence of our tragic global pandemic, the report was circulated by email for the first time to me with, again for the first time to my knowledge, an affirmative recommendation for no name change. The email directed an up or down vote on the lengthy report within 13 days. Revisions were submitted on April 23, requesting a vote within 7 days. I and others voiced concerns over the surprising fast tracking of the report, including a new and central conclusion on name change. Initial reassurances of more time were followed by a May 11 email rejecting the requests for more time and discussions and directing a vote within 3 days. At the suggestion of Professor Schiller acknowledging, this conference was set up. I believe with the objective of convincing me to join a putative majority.

But this approach is a big mistake. Given the absence of community input, legal analysis and historical context, if any recommendation is to be made it should be to create a study group to do that work and really look seriously and pragmatically at name change. Exactly what Professor Schiller concluded so emphatically on the record as it existed in 2018.

On the current record, which we undertook to develop, I find myself in the position Professor Schiller was in in 2018, feeling that we lack the critical input necessary for the robust discussion and careful deliberation that his report contemplated and the committee endorsed.

In short, on this record I do not believe it appropriate for the committee to now issue a recommendation on the re-naming. In effect, we have only started the necessary discussions and we don't have all the data we agreed and worked toward generating for over a year. I do concur whole-heartedly in the programs of restorative justice advanced by the committee. They are a tangible and a powerful way of channeling the law school's resources and energies.

If we must rush forward, even in the face of global pandemic, on name change I support a statement of pros and cons only. But I would prefer to complete the work we undertook and I have spent years attending to.

Some final words on perspective and opportunities:

In this new age in which we live, I submit that the benefits of name-change should be carefully considered, and not assumed to be disruptive and upsetting to a status quo which frankly faces deep challenges financially and perhaps culturally as well. A couple data points bear stating, in March 2020, due to Covid- 19 UC law schools reported the need for funding of tens of millions in unexpected expenses. Further, I have read reports that amongst public law schools and UC law schools in particular, UC Hastings' students carry the largest load of student debt.

In a nation in which the "student class" is burdened by over a trillion in student debt and economic recovery hinges in part on the successful transition of these new professionals to productive economic life, I believe the Board of Directors must think outside the box—perhaps dramatically so—and that name-change might be exactly a course to chart a new approach to revamp UC Hastings' historical insular identity.

But this is not to detract from the main thrust of what I have seen as the HLRC function, to assess Serannus Hastings' conduct, a point that buttresses my sympathy for name change.

I note that public comment on Judge Hastings' conduct dates back at least to 2007 in internet-available articles. Hastings was expert in utilizing "externalities" to shift to the State the substantial expenses of clearing his claimed lands and perpetuating a slave system predicated on terror, killings, rapes, and forced family separation which funneled into the slave camp known as the Nome Cult Farm, where one could eat only if one could work.

This system of liquidation, enslavement and shifting of externalities is, and I believe the committee has found it, "genocidal", with all that terms carries with it.

We now live in a world of fundamental changes and his antiquely worded sentiments take on new significance. In the Me Too, post-Charlottesville, Black Lives Matter, Standing Rock era, I am concerned we run the risk of missing the tidal changes in attitudes and values with which all our boats may be lifted. Perhaps these are the polemics the report suggests we can and should avoid. For sure, we understand that these issues inform the cultural matrix through which the Board must act, and, ultimately, may be judged. But now with Covid 19, no greater invitation to re-imagining the future could exist.

It is hard for me to conceive the impact it will have if we recognize “significant proof” of genocidal atrocities, a truly monumental placard in the history of the institution, yet still stand by the surname in perpetuity. I am concerned we are at risk of grave minimization by way of the banalization of the term “genocide”.

When we started there were apprehensions, even outright resistance to calling this conduct a “genocide.” Aside from ignoring the process we agreed to, I am concerned the proposed recommendation on name change does not adequately reflected the significance of the findings we are now subscribing to. Once the school itself accepts that proposition (genocidal atrocities by its founder), even by way of ad hoc assessment, I think the obligation to act with utmost care and sensitivity must be apparent, and should ultimately repose with the Board as the chief policy making body of the law school.

In this regard, the recommendation misses a critical opportunity to respond to the “Moral Case for Renaming” the school as it was raised in the 2017 SF Chronicle article. I don’t think it is enough to say we will be criticized either way we go. What are the moral issues, and where do they lead? Professor Shiller provided a very detailed road map for these consideration.

I am sure there are substantial pockets of attachment to the name, perhaps deep ones. Yet why not think in terms of the naming alternatives, which could be substantial for the law school at this very difficult time. I note a recent article outlining a $50 million gift given by former dean Gordon Rausser to the College of Natural Resource’s at Berkeley in February of this year (<https://news.berkeley.edu/2020/02/29/college-of-natural-resources-receives-50-million-naming-gift/>). In these extraordinarily challenging economic times, when the very existence of significant components of the higher education system and the welfare of the “student class” is at issue, I believe our analysis should be more robust on the subject of real and tangible benefits of name-change.

For my own part, and those I informally poll, it is hard to justify retaining a name for the school of a confirmed human rights’ criminal. If any fight would be worth fighting, it would seem that would be it. In any event, it may be justified. On the issue the alumni should be heard. Position papers and discussion should be encouraged, as we planned they would be.

Therefore, I dissent from any naming recommendation without completing our tasks, undertaken and now abandoned, of alumni outreach, legal analysis and historical contextualization.

I am reminded of one of the first events at the College I attended: a lecture by William Brennan entitled "In Defense of Dissents." I hope in that spirit my dissent serves the ends of fair process.
